

Honor, Truth, And Love As Abstract Nouns

Posted on September 22, 2018

An abstract noun is a noun that tends to denote quality, an idea, rather than a concrete object. We can take an example of abstract nouns, including danger or truth. In other words, abstract nouns refer to intangible things, including feelings, ideas, qualities, and concepts. It means that something exists but not in a concrete form. The paper is going to look at honor, truth, and love as abstract nouns and try to classify, find the synonyms, and try to offer an illustration regarding the idea (Oxford English Dictionary).

Honor

Honor, as an abstract noun, refers to high respect or great esteem that people tend to accord to someone or something. To refer to something, such as honor, we can use the example of the following sentence to illustrate honor, referring to a place that is accorded high respect. "The portrait of Barack Obama is hanging on the walls of the National Gallery, a place of honor." The synonyms that we can use to mean the same as honor in the context of great esteem or high respect include glory, importance, credit, notability, privilege, kudos, renown, credit, merit, distinction, and cachet.

Honor can also refer to the quality of having the knowledge and doing what is morally upright. In this context, we can have an example illustrating honor in the context of doing what is morally upright. "David Cameron, as a matter of honor, decided to step aside after the Brexit referendum where he lost." The former prime minister thought it wise that there was no need to continue to stay in office after losing the trust of the British people; hence, he decided to exit the office in an honorable way. The general public believes that he was a man of honor. The synonyms in this context of knowing and doing what is morally right include righteousness, fidelity, justice, goodness, trustworthiness, ethics, principle, honesty, fairness, morals, dependability, and noble-mindedness.

Truth

Truth, as an abstract noun, refers to the state or the quality of being true. As Russia is constantly involved in cyber-crime, many countries doubted the truth of their last statement. Many people will want Russia to accept the truth of the accusations that they are involved in cyber-crimes. The two sentences are pointing out "truth" as an abstract noun to show the state of being true. We have various synonyms of truth in this context, and they include verity, sincerity, factualness, gospel, authenticity, candor, honesty, accuracy, veracity, and informally it is the dinkum oil.

The second context of the truth refers to something that is in accordance with the reality or fact or something that is true. Examples in this context include the honest truth that France, Britain, Ireland, and Russia were part of the Triple Entente alliance during the events of World War I. The synonyms in this context include reality, actuality, and real life.

The third context of the abstract noun truth is the reference to the fact of the belief that people accept as true. In the modern world, we have various scientific discoveries that people consider to be true. We can refer to the scientific discoveries as the scientific truth. We can have the example in the sentence whereby we can state that the emergence of scientific truths is proving to be an important point in the lives of many people who believe in science. The synonyms include verity, certainty, principle, fact, and certitude.

Love

Love refers to the strong feeling of affection that people or animals with feelings tend to have towards something or someone else. Babies tend to have strong feelings of intense love towards their parents. We can have an example of a sentence in this context. "My neighbour has triplets who tend to have intense feelings of love towards their dad". The synonyms in this context include tenderness, attachment, endearment, intimacy, warmth and fondness, passion, desire, lust, infatuation, ardor and doting, kindness, charity, philanthropy, and benevolence.

It can also refer to the great interest and pleasure in something like sports. We can have an example in this context. "The people of Great Britain tend to have a great love for football. Most of the people will love their football clubs and will always support their clubs in whichever way possible. We have various synonyms in this context, and they include weakness, bent, liking, inclination, disposition, proclivity, enthusiasm, predilection, penchant, keenness, zeal, zest, and taste.

In conclusion, abstract nouns are very important when it comes to denoting or relating to an art that is not in any way attempting to represent the external reality but is rather seeking to achieve its effect using shapes, textures, and color. Most people refer to abstract nouns as intangible things, as we have already demonstrated above. We say that our five physical senses are not in a position to detect an abstract noun. That means that we cannot smell, touch, taste, see, or even hear an abstract noun. Abstract nouns tend to denote quality, an idea rather than a concrete object. In other words, abstract nouns refer to intangible things, including feelings, ideas, qualities, and concepts. It means that something exists but not in the concrete form as we have discussed in the essay above. It is always very easy for an individual to point out an abstract noun in a sentence.
