

Intrinsically Evil Acts in Catholic Moral Theology

Posted on September 18, 2019

An intrinsically evil act is a kind of performance that is, by its very nature, wicked. Intrinsically evil acts are characteristically discordant with the love of God and the neighbour. This usually makes an act intrinsically evil in its ethical purpose, that is, the end in terms of goodness, toward which that act is integrally well-ordered. Through its very natural surroundings, the sovereignty of the purpose of the individual who selects the act and free of the conditions, an intrinsically evil act is well-ordered headed for an evil end, on the road to an end unsuited with the intention of God as our uppermost good and last end.

Why Intrinsically Evil Acts Cannot Become Moral

Intrinsically evil acts are continuously wicked, irrespective of the meaning or purpose for which the act was chosen, notwithstanding the conditions or penalties of the act and, unrelatedly, the other performances that are selected before, through, or after the intrinsically evil act. Nothing can cause an intrinsically evil act to develop into a moral act. The lone ethical choice is to select a changed type of deed, one that is not intrinsically evil.

Reason and the Moral Object

Reason shows that there are entities of human acts that are by their nature unqualified to be ordered to God since they are fundamentally in contrast to the goodness of the being made in his image. These are the acts in the Church's moral custom that have been characterized as being intrinsically evil.

In other words, their very objective is apart from the secret intents of the person acting and the conditions.

Church Teaching and Scripture

In its instructions about the reality of intrinsically evil actions, the Church consents to the philosophy of the Holy Scriptures.

Intention and Circumstances Cannot Justify Evil

If the actions are essentially deemed to be wicked, a righteous sense or explicit status can diminish their evil, but they cannot eradicate it (Catholic Church, 1997). They endure irremediably evil activities and are not adroit in being well-ordered to the Godhead and to the virtuous character of the creature. Therefore, conditions or meanings can certainly not alter an act of essential evil by virtue of its purpose into an act intuitively moral or defensible as a selection.

Illustrations of intrinsically evil acts include:

- Murder
- straight abortion
- contraception
- euthanasia
- theft
- lying
- fornication
- adultery
- blasphemy
- Adultery
- Physical torture
- Masturbation

Intrinsically evil actions are certainly not defensible by the objective, or by conditions, or by other actions.

When it comes to the issue of women who use the justification of abortion as a result of finding out that the fetus is malformed in some way, and they assume and assert that they do not want the baby to be brought into the creation to suffer, there is no excuse. God has given us free will; a person can do whatever they want, but there are penalties.

Abortion is regarded as one of the greatest monstrous actions man can commit, and uses education to validate when a fetus can be aborted. Whether it is considered humane or not, the Church believes it is at the instant of conception that a person has to be defended.

There are many questions that have been asked regarding women who use the justification of abortion as a result of finding out the fetus is deformed, and yet they do not want the child to suffer.

Murder

Then, the Church asks whether we can kill humans who suffer or should kill anybody who is deemed less than perfect. Are you supporting the murder of all handicapped human beings?

Voting Against Intrinsically Evil Acts

The main query to ask is this: Are any of the aspirants from either party or independents standing for something that is fundamentally evil, no matter what the conditions? If that is the case, a Catholic, irrespective of party association, should not vote for such an aspirant.

We should be conscious of intrinsically evil acts and, as Christians, must obstinately witness against those activities, and one of the ways Christians witness against those acts is in their voting (John Paul II, 1993).

Conclusion

Intrinsically evil actions, for those persons who read and are unaccustomed to the terminology, are those things persons do that are well thought-out by Catholics to be continuously and universally wrong, irrespective of condition. The reason these actions are considered intrinsically evil is that the individual's objective in performing an act when they feel it is wrong.

Reason proves that there are substances of human actions that are by their nature unqualified from being ordered by God since they fundamentally oppose the good of being completed in his image. These are the actions which, in the Church's just custom, have been called intrinsically evil.

The reason why these acts are reflected to be continuously immoral is in part because the drive of these acts is not once one that lures us closer to God. In Catholic ethical doctrines, the purpose is continually Christian discipleship with an opinion in the direction of our final objective being in union with God.

Additionally, these actions are reflected as erroneous since they do not permit the shared good precisely because they disregard the self-esteem of humans.

To put this in terms of the gospel, intrinsically evil actions do not allow humans to love God or their neighbours in the approach that Jesus called Christians to do.
