

Mueller 32 In Theological Foundations

Posted on October 17, 2018

Introduction

The original notes titled “Mueller 32 in Theological Foundations” collect definitions and claims about faith, reason, worldview, revelation, God, the Holy Spirit, covenant, Christ, Scripture, and the New Testament. They appear to draw from Martin Albl’s Reason, Faith, and Tradition and a text identified as Mueller, but several statements confuse terms or attribute ideas inaccurately. Materialism is not simply greed by a ruling class, a paradigm is not God entering dialogue with creation, and the New Testament does not mean only “new regeneration.” Thomas Aquinas’s argument is also more complex than saying every event has a cause and therefore God is the first event. (Albl; Aquinas)

A coherent theological foundation should explain how Christian theology relates revelation, Scripture, tradition, reason, experience, and the life of the church. It should distinguish claims shared across Christianity from positions associated with particular traditions. Theology is disciplined reflection on faith; it does not eliminate mystery, and faith is not the refusal to ask questions.

What Theology Studies

Theology literally concerns discourse about God, but Christian theology studies God in relation to creation, humanity, Christ, Spirit, church, salvation, and final hope. It uses biblical interpretation, historical sources, philosophical reasoning, worship, and lived practice.

Theology is not identical to religious studies. Religious studies may examine traditions descriptively through history, sociology, anthropology, or psychology. Theology often asks normative questions from within or in conversation with faith: What should be believed, and how should life respond?

Faith and Reason

The original notes state that faith is “unquestionable” because it concerns the unknown or unknowable. Christian thinkers have often rejected that simple opposition. Faith involves trust and commitment, while reason examines coherence, evidence, implications, and objections.

Reason cannot reduce God to an object fully mastered by the mind. Yet believers use reason whenever they interpret Scripture, distinguish doctrines, answer criticism, or decide how faith applies. A mature faith can ask questions without assuming that doubt and belief are enemies.

Revelation

Revelation is God's self-disclosure. Christian theology commonly distinguishes general revelation—knowledge of God associated with creation, conscience, and reason—from special revelation associated with Israel, Scripture, and especially Jesus Christ.

Revelation is not merely the delivery of facts. It establishes relationship and calls for response. Traditions differ over how Scripture, church teaching, and experience mediate revelation.

Scripture

Christian Scripture includes the Old and New Testaments, though traditions differ in the Old Testament canon. Scripture contains law, narrative, poetry, prophecy, wisdom, Gospel, letters, and apocalypse. Genre shapes interpretation.

The claim that every translation should be literal is misleading. Languages do not map word for word, and a strictly literal rendering can obscure meaning. Translators balance form, context, grammar, idiom, and audience. Interpretation should attend to authorial and historical context, literary form, canonical relationships, and contemporary application.

Tradition

Tradition is the transmission of teaching, worship, practice, and interpretation through the community. Catholic, Orthodox, and Protestant approaches assign tradition different authority, but no Christian reader encounters Scripture without inherited language and assumptions.

Tradition can preserve wisdom and also require reform. Theological study examines continuity, development, conflict, councils, creeds, and the experiences excluded from official narratives.

Worldview

A worldview is a broad framework through which people interpret reality, value, knowledge, humanity, and destiny. Religions can shape worldviews, but not every worldview is religious. Naturalism, secular humanism, and forms of materialism are also worldviews.

Calling Hinduism, Buddhism, Islam, or Christianity one simple worldview ignores internal diversity. A worldview analysis should avoid caricature and compare specific claims fairly.

Transcendence and Immanence

Divine transcendence means that God exceeds creation and cannot be contained within it. Divine immanence means that God is present and active in creation. Christian theology usually holds both.

Transcendence is not merely “power beyond limits.” It concerns the difference between Creator and creation. Immanence does not mean God is identical with the world. The balance protects theology from reducing God either to a distant mechanism or to one object among others.

Divine Incomprehensibility

To say God is incomprehensible does not mean nothing can be known. It means finite minds cannot exhaust the infinite reality of God. Theology can make truthful claims while recognizing analogy and mystery.

The tradition sometimes uses the image of overwhelming light appearing as darkness: the problem is not absence of divine reality but the limitation of human perception. Humility is therefore an intellectual virtue.

The Name YHWH

YHWH is the four-letter divine name revealed in the Hebrew Scriptures and associated with Exodus 3. The phrase often translated “I AM WHO I AM” or “I WILL BE WHAT I WILL BE” has generated extensive interpretation.

Jewish tradition commonly avoids pronouncing the name, using substitutes such as Adonai. Christian writing should treat the name with historical and religious care rather than using it as a simple vocabulary item.

Attributes of God

The original notes list kindness, care, power, and intelligence. Classical Christian theology discusses goodness, wisdom, power, justice, mercy, holiness, knowledge, eternity, and faithfulness. Attributes are not separate pieces assembled into God.

Different traditions debate immutability, impassibility, foreknowledge, and divine action. Theological language should be grounded in Scripture and tradition while acknowledging interpretive differences.

Sovereignty and Human Freedom

Divine sovereignty refers to God's rule and ultimate authority. It raises difficult questions about freedom, evil, prayer, and responsibility. Determinism is the view that events are fixed by prior conditions and laws; it is not identical to every doctrine of providence.

Christian traditions range from strong predestinarian accounts to views emphasizing libertarian freedom or cooperation with grace. The challenge is to affirm divine agency without making human choices morally meaningless.

The Problem of Evil

If God is good and powerful, why is there suffering? Theology offers responses involving freedom, soul formation, natural order, sin, protest, and the cross. No explanation should make a sufferer's pain seem trivial.

Biblical faith includes lament and wrestling with God. Questioning can be an expression of relationship rather than rejection.

Materialism

Philosophical materialism holds that reality is fundamentally material or physical. It is not the same as consumerism, which is excessive emphasis on possessions. Marx's critique of religion and ruling-class ideology is another distinct argument.

Christian theology generally rejects reductive materialism but affirms the goodness of material creation, bodily resurrection, and care for physical life. It is not a flight from matter.

Rationalism

Rationalism gives reason a primary role in knowledge. It is not simply the ability to distinguish right from wrong. Moral reasoning is one use of reason, while rationalist philosophies make broader claims about the sources and structure of knowledge.

Theology can use rational argument without claiming reason is self-sufficient. Faith and reason may correct distorted forms of each other.

Aquinas and the First Cause

Thomas Aquinas's "Five Ways" do not merely say that everything has a cause. If everything, including God, required the same kind of cause, the argument would fail. Aquinas reasons from change, efficient causation, contingency, degrees, and governance toward a foundational reality.

His arguments arise within a larger metaphysics of act, potency, essence, existence, and participation. They are debated, but they should be represented accurately.

Theophany

A theophany is a manifestation of God, such as divine appearances described in biblical narratives. It is not simply God being kind. Fire, cloud, voice, messenger, vision, and glory can function as signs of divine presence.

Christian interpretation often distinguishes theophany from the incarnation, in which the Word becomes flesh in Jesus Christ.

Christology

The original notes call Jesus an "invisible image of God." Colossians describes Christ as the image of the invisible God. The point is that the invisible God is made known in Christ, not that Christ's image is invisible.

Classical Christology confesses Jesus as truly divine and truly human. The councils of Nicaea and Chalcedon provided influential language, while theologians continue to explore incarnation, ministry, death, resurrection, and liberation.

The Holy Spirit

The Holy Spirit is not merely a feeling of connection. Christian doctrine understands the Spirit as divine, active in creation, prophecy, the life of Jesus, the church, sanctification, gifts, and hope.

Romans 8 contrasts life oriented toward the flesh with life in the Spirit and connects the Spirit who raised Jesus with future life. "Flesh" in Paul should not be reduced to the physical body; it often describes humanity organized in resistance to God.

The Church

The church is a community called into worship, witness, service, and communion. The Spirit's work includes reconciliation and transformation, but churches can resist that work through division, abuse, or exclusion.

Ecclesiology asks about authority, sacraments, ministry, mission, unity, and relationship to society. Different traditions answer these questions differently.

Covenant

A covenant is a solemn relationship established through promises and obligations. Biblical covenants include those associated with Noah, Abraham, Israel, David, and the new covenant.

Genesis 12-50 narrates Abraham's call, family, promise, conflict, and descendants. The promise includes land, descendants, and blessing for the families of the earth. It should not be reduced to a guarantee that one family will "rule forever."

Old and New Testaments

"Testament" translates a term related to covenant. The New Testament is the collection of writings witnessing to Jesus and the early church, not merely a synonym for regeneration. It includes Gospels, Acts, Pauline and General Epistles, and Revelation.

The relationship between the Testaments should not erase Judaism or treat the Old Testament as obsolete. Christian interpretation sees continuity and fulfillment while also confronting the history of anti-Jewish readings.

Interpretation

The original notes say "the Bible should interpret itself." Canonical comparison can illuminate passages, but it cannot replace historical and literary analysis. Difficult texts should not be harmonized prematurely.

Responsible interpretation asks what the text meant in context, how it functions within the canon, how traditions have read it, and how application affects real people. Readers should identify assumptions and listen to perspectives beyond their own community.

Theology and Ethics

Theology has ethical consequences. Beliefs about creation influence environmental responsibility; beliefs about the image of God influence human dignity; beliefs about Christ and Spirit shape service and reconciliation.

Correct doctrine cannot be separated completely from practice. At the same time, moral failure does not prove every theological claim false. The relationship requires ongoing examination.

Conclusion

A theological foundation is not a list of disconnected definitions. It is an organized account of how faith seeks understanding through revelation, Scripture, tradition, reason, and lived community. Terms such as transcendence, materialism, rationalism, theophany, covenant, and canon have specific meanings that should not be blurred.

Christian theology affirms that God can be known truly but not exhaustively, that Christ reveals the invisible God, and that the Spirit gives life and forms community. It also makes room for questioning, lament, interpretation, and humility. The goal is not to eliminate mystery but to speak responsibly about it.

Works Cited

Albl, Martin C. Reason, Faith, and Tradition: Explorations in Catholic Theology. Saint Mary's Press, 2009.

Aquinas, Thomas. Summa Theologiae.

The Holy Bible. Genesis 12–50; Exodus 3; Romans 8; Colossians 1.

McGrath, Alister E. Christian Theology: An Introduction. Wiley-Blackwell.