

The strategies applied by the Virtual Police department

Posted on September 8, 2018

Investigative Strategy for the Very Bad Bike Club

The group is assigned to critically examine the strategies applied by the Virtual Police department as well as the investigative resources to charge against members of Very Bad Bike Club (VBBC). This comes after investigations of people complaining and calling for criminal investigations. The department has the cause to arrest and charge almost everyone, including 63 VBBC members, for conspiracy to sell, manufacture, and distribute illegal drugs.

Law Enforcement agencies should perform their duties diligently to ensure that they stop criminal activities by members. Criminals should also be charged in a court of law (Kratcoski, Crittenden & Worstall, 2017). The court may offer probation or jail the offenders. The security agency should ensure that they prevent crime and charge the offenders as provided in the law.

One of the solutions is the use of Institution-Based Corrections. These intuitions will monitor the progress of the offenders and assess whether they have been rehabilitated. However, they must refer the case back to the court and charge the offender if they do not comply (Matz, Conley & Johanneson, 2017). Moreover, Community-Based Corrections, such as Parole or Probation, are crucial in rehabilitating offenders, especially teens. Private Security may also reduce the rate of criminal activities in a particular area (Kratcoski, Crittenden & Worstall, 2017). They ensure the offenders are rehabilitated and do not engage in criminal activities.

The group members united in an effort to bring an end to criminal activities done by the VBBC members. There was no support from the members of the virtual criminal justice system (Seiter, 2011). The parole system should offer social and criminal history information for each juvenile. In this sense, the pre-screen establishes the risk level accorded to every individual. However, it is difficult to define the level of criminal activity because of the missing information required to accomplish the assignment. There is a need to promote a society where every individual has the obligation to protect the law. Security agencies should ensure that criminals are charged and prosecuted. The BBVC is a terrible criminal group that should be dealt with, and its activities should be monitored by security agencies.

Improving Parole Systems and Information Access

The solution is to develop increased efficiency and effectiveness of parole systems to sustain the Agency's task of public safety and flourishing offender re-integration (Matz, Conley & Johanneson, 2017). Moreover, creating electronic text libraries of the Offender's case files facilitates the Commission of staff at every level to easily access relevant, available data to make appropriate and justified decisions. Overall, the solution offers the capability to describe workflows for forming legal documents. An efficient solution to address the present probation system is employing more probation officers to help keep an eye on the offenders so they do not attempt to fall through the opening and find themselves back into problems (Kratcoski, Crittenden & Worstall, 2017). The implication is that more officers can coordinate their work as a watchdog to offenders instead of a few probation officers who have been there and had a huge workload. Notably, probation officers should be taken more seriously and appreciated for helping to weed out offenders. Also, there needs to be a big caseload for a few officers on probation. Overall, there is a need for stipulations concerning probation restrictions. There are better solutions than the present population corrections options (Matz, Conley & Johanneson, 2017). First, there is a better and more efficient solution to the current choices of community restrictions that could include many programs to assist the offenders within the community.

Community Involvement and Offender Reintegration

Further, there is a need for more community involvement. This is required of the offenders to help them avoid problems (Seiter, 2011). Arguably, some people may not want to help the offender. However, not all are negative; some are willing to help the offender transform and reach the right path. It is important to note that society is important in criminals' integration and rehabilitation process. The process of recovery may be difficult if the community is not involved (Kratcoski, Crittenden & Worstall, 2017). The community has the duty of enhancing individual rehabilitation. Society agencies should come together to deal with crime issues amicably. For those offenders who are on probation should be given the support and integrated back into the society.

In conclusion, criminal justice should be available to help individuals get on the right track. Criminal justice should involve and engage society to help rehabilitate offenders. Parole, rehabilitation, community corrections, and probation are important means to get someone started, particularly those who committed the crime. It is, therefore, important for individuals to identify the type of assistance they may need after violating the law. Overall, rehabilitation is the leading choice for offenders to get corrected and live normal lives.

References

Kratcoski, P. C., Crittenden, S., & Worstall, S. (2017). Community-Based Sanctions: Probation and Post-release Supervision. In Correctional Counseling and Treatment (pp. 131-160). Springer, Cham.

Matz, A. K., Conley, T. B., & Johanneson, N. (2017). What do supervision officers do? Adult probation/parole officer workloads in a rural Western state. Journal of Crime and Justice, 1-16.

Seiter, R. (2011). Corrections: An Introduction. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Pearson Hall.